

certainly occurs at the edges of the volcanics, and may occur within their area, due to lateral variations in thickness and/or velocity. It is not possible to come to a definite conclusion without better data, but it seems likely that the high velocity anomaly is real, but exaggerated. If this is correct then the low shown is a real structure, but shallower, by perhaps 100 feet, than the map shows.

J.I. Denham,
Senior Geophysicist.