

two very small grains of zircon. The rock also once contained at least a trace of pyrite which has been replaced by iron oxides.

Much of the fragmental structure now visible in the rock is due to extensive fracturing and along some of the fractures there are concentrations of chlorite whereas others are marked by concentrations of sericite.

Conclusion:

Brecciated rhyolite which was very probably a pyroclastic.